

After the cold war
America & the world

Ty Yiu

2019-10-03

Contents

The surprising event of the collapse of the communism in the east. The first peak of American power happened in 1945, whilst simply after the cold war, it plateaued. The communist thread vanished, the American argument to pretext the globe and lead to prosperity, went up in smoke with it. US strategists resisted retrenchment, while advocates for or-back were labelled in support of 'isolationism'. A new kind of thread, unilaterally aligned against as a globe, should be the argument for involvement. The influence and power of the states (like trump asking Ukraine to investigate Biden) even in prosperous times. After the break down of the communism, Bush senior needed to assure that it wouldn't be able to be restored or altered. An installation of a new world order was Bush's grand plan. It could also be labelled community of nations to deter aggression. The need for one singular world order has become evident and defence as well of promotion towards globalisation would seem to make a divergence not probable. 'New Military Humanism' was instated, and was the argument used against western military intervention. Thus, anybody who didn't come to power through democratic support, will not be of sovereignty and thus 'conditional sovereignty' was coined.

Taking a gun and changing state in a country does not arise in a sovereign state, it is conditional.